A heavy smoker for more than 20 years (two packs a day), actress and director of Brazilian film festivals abroad, Adriana L. Dutra decided to look closely at: why after all it is so hard to quit smoking?

It all started with a personal interest that grew and became an extensive research on the topic. Nevertheless, Smoking I wait, goes beyond the traditional dimension of a self-focused documentary. Personal testimonials reveal individual battles with the cigarette, while advertising executives, lawyers, sociologists and doctors analyse techniques of diffusion and consequences of the use of nicotine and its high levels of chemical and psychological dependency.

The film presents the evolution of cigarette consumption since its inception, through the transformation of consumer's habits throughout history and marketing strategies, unveiling the industry's omission of medical data and compensations.

An upbeat animation created by Fabiana Egrejas and Carlos Duba outlines the historical and cultural evolution of the cigarette, while scenes of cult Hollywood movies show how stars and divas contributed to the tobacco industry's profits.

To address smoking within minority ethnic communities, stop-smoking services must offer support, information and advice that is both accessible and sensitive to different cultures, religions and languages. As well as smoked tobacco products a wide range of chewed tobacco and tobacco-related products such as paan are also used within some minority ethnic communities. This creates new challenges for stop-smoking services about how best to support and raise the issue of smoking and chewing tobacco.

Knowledge and understanding of chewed tobacco products used amongst this community and its health impact varies amongst practitioners. To address this gap and the ongoing challenge of increasing engagement of communities with stop-smoking services a multi media resource was developed by the Minority Ethnic Health Inclusion Project (MEHIP) called 'Oral health and trans-cultural tobacco: a guide for health professionals and trans-cultural tobacco users'.
